Pulse over 120; temperature 1060. In this case, the hyperpyrexia practically excluded the appendix as it cause. It did not, however, exclude the possibility of coexistent appendicitis. What made the latter diagnosis improbable was the fact that local pressure did not increase the ileocaecal distress, and that a suitable antipyretic in time relieved all regionary symptoms. Plasmodia established the malaria. The diagnosis of this and a number of similar cases in which the malaria was not so readily suspected on account of the absence of chill, or because the temperature at the time of observation was very much lower, is apparently very simple at a distance from the bedside; confronted with the situation, however, some worrisome moments are apt to ensue. This has been noted, perhaps, more particularly in younger children, in whom abdominal examinations prove very often anything but...
