Excerpt: . . . may hang beside the old bullion and velvet of a century ago, and sixteenth-century marble and oak may stand on nineteenth-century rush matting, and what a comfort it is if it may! Ill. sotiern deetie ftooni. An avowedly modern room (one in which modern upholstery prevails) always seems to. me injured by the introduction of antiquities, which, like peculiar shades of colour, and certain classes of ornament, always require carrying out of the picture. They injure the modern manufactures by putting out their light (according to the connoisseur), or by looking shabby (according to the Philistine); and after all they almost disappear in their places, lost and overpowered by the more self-asserting shapes and dyes of machine-cutting and distillation, like timid waifs hunted about and pecked to death. Thus a modern eclectic room may admit modern Oriental objects in sufficiently small quantities, Indian, Chinese,...
